Debate ignited by Tatler magazine's portrait of Catherine, Princess of Wales

Description

A controversial new portrait of Catherine, the Princess of Wales, has sparked debate online. The painting, created by artist Hannah Uzor, features on the cover of Tatler magazine's July issue. It portrays Catherine during her appearance at King Charles III's first state banquet. Uzor studied photographs of the princess to capture her essence in the artwork.

The portrait has received mixed reviews, with some royal fans criticizing it for its lack of resemblance to Catherine. One commenter described it as a "bad GCSE project," while another found it disrespectful. However, there were also positive comments, with one person calling the painting "beautiful."

The backlash surrounding the portrait mirrors a similar discussion about King Charles III's official portrait. Painted by Jonathan Yeo, it shows the monarch in the uniform of the Welsh Guards against a fiery red background. While the King reportedly approves of the portrait, some have criticized it for its bold brushstrokes, with one person comparing it to a "poster for a horror film."

Overall, the portraits of Catherine and King Charles III have prompted diverse reactions from the public and art critics alike.
