

Fish Evolve Legs for Finding and Tasting Buried Food

Description

The northern sea robin uses its legs to find food in the seabed

Anik Grearson

A remarkable species of fish residing in the depths of the Atlantic Ocean has developed legs that serve a unique purpose beyond locomotion. These specialized appendages function as sensory organs akin to a tongue, enabling the fish to locate and capture buried prey within the ocean floor.

Known as northern sea robins (Prionotus carolinus), these creatures possess three legs on each side of their bodies, emerging from the base of their pectoral fins, originating from structures within the fins known as fin rays.

During a scientific expedition to Woods Hole, Massachusetts, led by Nicholas Bellono from Harvard University, the team encountered anecdotes highlighting the sea robins' adept hunting abilities, prompting them to transport live specimens back to their research facility.

To their astonishment, the sea robins showcased exceptional skill in detecting and retrieving prey, including ground mussel extract and individual amino acids concealed within capsules, according to Bellono.

Subsequent analysis revealed distinct differences between sea robins that could locate buried prey and those that could not, manifesting in the form of specialized sensory papillae on the digging legs, a feature absent in their non-digging counterparts.

This evolutionary adaptation is controlled by an ancient regulatory gene named tbx3a, as identified by team member David Kingsley at Stanford University. Kingsley emphasizes the sea robin's unique ability to modify existing anatomical structures for new functions, illustrating a fascinating example of evolutionary adaptation.

Comprehension Questions

Multiple Choice

1. What unique function do the legs of the northern sea robin serve?

Option: Locomotion

Option: Sensory organs to locate buried prey

Option: Swimming faster Option: Camouflage

2. How many legs does the northern sea robin have on each side of its body?

Option: Two Option: Three Option: Four Option: Five

3. What did the team led by Nicholas Bellono discover about the northern sea robin?

Option: They are fast swimmers

Option: They use their legs to detect and retrieve prey

Option: They can fly short distances

Option: They change color based on their environment

4. What regulatory gene controls the northern sea robin's evolutionary adaptation?

Option: tbx1
Option: tbx2a
Option: tbx3a
Option: tbx4b

5. What feature is present in sea robins that can locate buried prey?

Option: Brightly colored scales

Option: Specialized sensory papillae on their legs

Option: Sharp teeth Option: Thicker skin

6. Where did the scientific expedition that discovered the northern sea robin's abilities take place?

Option: Bermuda

Option: Woods Hole, Massachusetts

Option: Galapagos Islands Option: Great Barrier Reef

Answer

Multiple Choice: 1. Sensory organs to locate buried prey 2. Three 3. They use their legs to detect and retrieve prey 4. tbx3a 5. Specialized sensory papillae on their legs 6. Woods Hole, Massachusetts
