

One in Five UK Adults Unemployed

Description

Recent statistics indicate that over one-fifth of working-age adults in the UK are neither employed nor actively searching for jobs. This economic inactivity rate stood at 21.5% in the three months leading up to January, reflecting a decrease from both the preceding quarter and the same period last year, thus suggesting a relatively low rate compared to trends observed since 2009.

These figures have drawn attention, especially as the government unveils plans to stimulate economic growth. The announcement of potential cuts to sickness and disability benefits has sparked considerable debate. Critics, including Labour representatives and various charities, argue that such cuts could exacerbate poverty among disabled individuals.

Work and Pensions Secretary Liz Kendall acknowledged the challenges ahead, stating that the latest figures highlight the difficulties in increasing employment levels across Britain. Meanwhile, the Office for National Statistics cautioned that recent job figures should be interpreted with care due to low response rates to their employment surveys.

Despite these concerns, there was positive news about wage growth, which has continued to outpace inflation, with pay excluding bonuses rising by 5.9% year-on-year, particularly in sectors like retail and hospitality.
