

Real estate fees could fall after settlement with US agents

Description

Article:

A legal settlement in a case targeting US real estate agents could signify a decrease in the cost of real estate transactions. The National Association of Realtors (NAR) and property firms were implicated in lawsuits for allegedly inflating sales commissions.

The settlement allocated a substantial reparation of $418m (£328m) in damages and was declared last Friday. This decision necessitates NAR to lessen commissions and facilitate buyers to bargain fees, which may decrease costs associated with buying and selling a house.

The NAR, based in Chicago, stated that approximately a million of its members are encompassed by the settlement, still subject to court approval. They operate a database named the multiple listing service, or MLS, and mandate homeowners to offer a set commission rate before their properties are listed.

With no such requirement, potential homebuyers now have the liberty to negotiate lower commission rates or agree on a fixed-price fee for sales. The settlement also encompasses provisions that might reduce transaction costs. Nykia Wright, NAR's interim CEO, applauded the settlement, saying it preserved consumer choice and protected their members.

The provisions of the settlement, commencing in July, do not necessitate the property companies or NAR to confess any wrongdoing. Numerous other lawsuits have not been resolved yet, and there's a potential federal investigation underway.

Robert Braun, a Chicago-based lawyer, described the settlement as a significant deviation from the norm but remained uncertain whether it would influence housing prices.
