

Renowned Producer Roger Corman Passes Away at Age 98, Leaving a Legacy of Hollywood Mentorship

Description

Renowned B-movie producer Roger Corman passed away at the age of 98 in his Santa Monica home on May 9. His family announced his death on social media, without revealing the cause. Described as generous and kind, Corman was not only a pioneering filmmaker but also a mentor to many Hollywood icons, such as Francis Ford Coppola, Martin Scorsese, and Ron Howard.

Throughout his impressive career spanning almost seven decades, Corman earned the title "King of the Bs" for his work on hundreds of low-budget films. He founded New World Pictures and later Concorde-New Horizons, focusing on home video production. Corman's influence extended beyond the camera as he nurtured the talents of rising stars like Jack Nicholson, William Shatner, and Robert De Niro.

Known for his efficient filmmaking style, Corman prioritized pre-production and meticulous planning, passing down his expertise to future directors like Scorsese. His films, ranging from sci-fi to horror, captured audiences with titles like "The Little Shop of Horrors" and "Death Race 2000," launching careers and setting industry standards.

Corman's legacy was not limited to his films but extended to the directors he guided towards success. From humble beginnings to Oscar-winning achievements, Corman's influence remains immeasurable in Hollywood. Survived by his wife and daughters, Corman's simple yet profound self-description resonates with his dedication to his craft: "I was a filmmaker, just that."
