

Summer concert demand decreases following Taylor Swift and Beyoncé's megatours last year

Description

In recent years, live music experienced a huge resurgence post-pandemic, with fans eager to catch up on missed concerts flocking to massive stadium tours by stars like Taylor Swift and Beyoncé. However, a recent trend of tour cancellations and changes by well-known artists suggests that consumer interest in live music may be waning.

Jennifer Lopez canceled her tour to prioritize family time, while the Black Keys opted for smaller venues over an arena tour. This shift indicates a possible slowdown in the high demand seen in the post-pandemic "funflation" era.

Jarred Arfa, from Independent Artist Group, believes that the market is not necessarily slowing down, but rather returning to a pre-pandemic state where not every artist is a winner. Rising ticket prices have also contributed to consumer fatigue, with average ticket prices increasing significantly since 2019.

The streaming era has seen more artists touring to maximize returns, leading to a crowded market where some acts may struggle to stand out. This oversaturation could explain why major events like Coachella took longer to sell out this year.

Despite record-breaking years for companies like Live Nation, early indicators suggest that growth may slow in 2024. Concert resale prices are down, and concerns around ticket prices, cancellations, and a data breach affecting Ticketmaster are ongoing issues.

While some top artists still command high demand, the industry is evolving, with fewer megatours expected this year. Not every artist can replicate the success of Taylor Swift and Beyoncé, highlighting the changing landscape of live music.

The live music scene is in flux, and it remains to be seen how industry players will adapt to evolving consumer trends and preferences.
