

The findings of a CBS News poll show that an overwhelming majority of Americans approve of the United States taking action to combat climate change.

Description

In recent years, record heat, hurricanes, and wildfires have dominated headlines, sparking discussions about climate change. While opinions on the direct link between these events and climate change vary, a majority of Americans feel that addressing climate change is crucial. Interestingly, those who have experienced extreme weather are more inclined to believe urgent action is necessary.

Notably, age plays a role in shaping these attitudes, with younger Americans, including younger Republicans, expressing stronger support for addressing climate change. There is a growing sense of urgency among the public, with many believing that action should be taken within the next few years, if not immediately.

The personal responsibility to combat climate change is also highlighted, with most Americans believing that individuals can make a difference. Additionally, individuals who have experienced extreme weather firsthand are more likely to advocate for addressing climate change.

Overall, while political divisions persist, especially between Democrats and Republicans, there is a growing consensus on the need to take action on climate change. The survey reflects a shift towards prioritizing environmental concerns and highlights the importance of collective efforts to combat climate change.
