

Volkswagen employees in Tennessee choose to become members of UAW

Description

Workers at the Volkswagen factory in Chattanooga, Tennessee have made history by voting to join the United Auto Workers union. This is the first time since the 1940s that a Southern auto factory has approved unionization through an election. The vote showed that 73 percent of workers supported joining the union, with the official results still pending confirmation. The victory is seen as a significant win for organized labor in the South, where unionization efforts have faced challenges. The UAW's successful campaign at the VW plant is also a political win for President Biden, who has backed union expansion. This development could have far-reaching implications for the UAW's efforts to organize more auto factories in the South. The National Labor Relations Board is expected to release the final results soon. This achievement represents a step forward for workers' rights and has the potential to impact labor movements across the United States.
