Why Singing Along to Wicked in Theaters Is a Bad Idea

Description

Something Wicked this way... sings?

Instead of simply reclining in a comfortable theater seat, munching on Goobers while basking in the film adaptation of the hit Broadway musical Wicked, fans are treating early screenings as personal sing-along sessions, according to The New York Times.

Indeed, moviegoers are ignoring numerous public service announcements that urge them to refrain from talking during films, opting instead to belt out their favorite Wicked songs as though they're auditioning for a community theater role.

While persistent cell phone use and chatter can be aggravating, disrupting a movie screening by singing Broadway tunes is a significant violation of cinema etiquette. It transforms a communal experience into an uncomfortable situation for those simply wishing to enjoy the film.

It's true that audiences have historically sung along at certain events, such as at midnight showings of The Rocky Horror Picture Show or designated sing-along screenings. However, experiencing someone loudly belting "Popular" while you are trying to savor your Diet Coke and enjoy the IMAX spectacle is akin to having someone blow cigarette smoke in your face during a fine dining experience.

If you feel compelled to sing Wicked songs with strangers, fear not: Universal will provide sing-along screenings starting this Christmas. You can dress as your favorite character, unleash your vocal talents, and join fellow fans without disturbing others.

Until then, please respect the theater environment. Many moviegoers simply want to revel in the performances of trained professionals, so let's save our singing for designated occasions. After all, everyone deserves a chance to enjoy the movie in peace.
